Brief Summary of Research

Due to my interdisciplinary background in Computational Linguistics and Communication Science, I have acquired a leading position in the budding field of computational communication science, specializing in the automatic analysis of large collections of political texts. I acquired various grants (NWO VENI, OC; Digging into Data; Joint E-science/Data Science; ERC H2020, Horizon RIA) to study substantive and methodological aspect of political communication. This resulted in a number of substantive collaborations and articles in the best-cited journals in the field, including Political Analysis, Journal of Communication, and Political Communication. I currently have an h-index of 24 with over 3,400 citations (Google Scholar).

I strongly believe science should contribute to society, and have lead a number of relevant projects for amongst others the Dutch Parliament, the Dutch Media Authority, and the Dutch Journalism Fund.

My methodological work have been disseminated to a broad audience of social science scholars, as R packages and as part of the AmCAT text analysis infrastructure that I developed during my PhD project and that is used in teaching and research projects at various universities.

Substantively I contributed to political communication, especially together with the Ph.D. students I supervise(d), e.g. on using Large Language Models in communicatio research (Moritz Laurer) news algorithms and diversity (Nicolas Mattis); digital tracking and filter bubbles (Felicia Loecherbach); the role of media logic in recent election campaigns (Janet Takens); the consequences of increased audience logic and the gatekeeping role of newspapers (Kasper Welbers), and tabloidization and news quality (Carina Jacobi).

My interdisciplinary background puts me in a unique position to continue to push the methodological state of the art in text analysis. As part of this effort, I co-founded and chaired (until 2020) the Computational Methods interest group in the International Communication Association (ICA), and co-founded and chair the VU Societal Analytics lab as well as the CCS.Amsterdam virtual collaborative research lab. I am editor-in-chief and co-founder of the Q1-ranked open access journal Computational Communication Research.
